L. Frank Baum is most well known for his book "The Wonderful Wizard of Oz", but in fact he was a prolific writer of children's books, having written over 50 novels, 80 short stories, 200 poems, and other various writings. These works were written using a number of different pseudonyms, including Capt. Hugh Fitzgerald, Laura Bancroft and Floyd Akers. He is known in his works to have been a great predictor of future technologies and events, such as the laptop computer in "The Master Key", and cordless phones in Tik-Tik of Oz.

Born on May 15, 1856 in New York in a small town called Chittenango, Baum's parents, Benjamin Ward and Cynthia Stanton, were both deeply religious Methodists, but that didn't stop him from having a very happy childhood with his nine siblings during the late 1850s through most of the 1860s. Due to his parent's religion, he and his siblings were schooled at home, meaning that other than his brothers and sisters, he had relatively few friends outside his home. This gave him a lot of time to read books from his father's extensive collection, where he quickly learned to hate the moral stories of the time and their usage of violence and terrifying monsters to get to the moral of the story. This is definitely where he found inspiration for his Oz books later in life, wanting to create stories that children, including his own, could read without having nightmares.
